CALL FOR PAPERS

Nowadays, it's important to share the most authoritative and updated information about the topics that could interest a large number of researchers, as well as the vast majority of the people. Many highly-cited journals often publish not only deeply technical reports, but also interesting point of views, brief and easy to read, which represent a significant contribute on a peculiar topic.

Biomedical Sciences have constantly improved their branches and their interactions with other sciences: it is widely recognized the importance of the nanotechnologies in medicine, even if the nanoscale was first used for physics applications in the recent years. Furthermore, the so called TERM, the tissue engineer and regenerative medicine, has developed several collateral interests: biomaterials are widely investigated, and now they are also considered an active way to manipulate cells. Also, diagnostic tools are of great interest in biomedical sciences: many new ways to make a reliable and early diagnosis are constantly hypothesized and investigated in the worldwide labs.
